

Advocates demand family caregivers be given access to long-term care homes

Nicole Bogart CTVNews.ca Writer
@nlynnbogart | Contact

Published Tuesday, June 16, 2020 6:56PM EDT

Long-term care residents died of neglect: military

CEO of CanAge, Laura Tablyn Watts discusses reports saying dozens of residents at two Toronto long-term care homes died of dehydration.

Power Play: Military's report on Ont. LTCs

Colin D'Mello breaks down the military's report on Ontario LTCs and whether Ontario will extend its stay-at-home order.

Ford hit with tough questions over long-term care

Ford defended his minister of long-term care and accepted responsibility for the future of the sector after coming out of self-isolation.

Ford hit with tough questions over long-term care

Ford defended his minister of long-term care and accepted responsibility for the future of the sector after coming out of self-isolation.

1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 >

SHARE: Share 2 Tweet Reddit Share 1.4K

TORONTO -- Advocacy groups and geriatric care specialists across Canada are calling on federal and provincial governments to allow family caregivers back into long-term care homes where their regular care should be deemed an essential service.

After months of lockdowns, residents who have avoided contracting COVID-19 are still experiencing the toll of the pandemic, experts say, including profound isolation that can result in irreversible physical and cognitive declines.

Those concerns are even higher for an estimated 80 per cent of long-term care residents who suffer from some form of dementia.

- Full coverage at CTVNews.ca/Coronavirus
- Tracking every case of COVID-19 in Canada
- 'Long journey ahead': Feds extend CERB by 8 weeks
- Canada-U.S. border to remain closed to non-essential travel for another month
- Advocates demand family caregivers be given access to long-term care homes
- 'Frightening': Doctor debunks claims that wearing a face mask is more harmful than COVID-19
- Ontario will not make it mandatory to wear masks or face coverings
- A single case could spark a new COVID-19 outbreak, Tam warns
- Toronto-area drivers, Americans being threatened in Ontario's cottage country
- Cheap and widely available

- Newsletter sign-up: Get The COVID-19 Brief sent to your inbox

But severe staffing shortages and restrictions on visitors have also led to serious allegations of improper care.

"There have been a lot of very troubling reports from families," Dr. Vivian Stamatopoulos, associate teaching professor at Ontario Tech University who specializes in family caregiving, told CTVNews.ca by phone Monday.

Stamatopoulos has been contacted by dozens of people who have shared tragic stories of family members who are "drastically fading." Among the more serious concerns are allegations of residents suffering dehydration, being left in soiled diapers for days and even the use of sedation to "pacify" residents.

Earlier this month, it was reported that an Ontario man died in a long-term care home in the Greater Toronto Area due to exhaustion from malnutrition -- a death Stamatopoulos and other advocates say may have been prevented if a family caregiver had the chance to intervene.

Advertisement

IN-DEPTH COVERAGE

TRACKING EVERY CASE OF COVID-19 IN CANADA

COVID-19 in Canada

life-saving, researchers say

- Quebec reports fewer than 100 new COVID-19 cases for first time since March 22, but testing continues to plummet
- 11 new cases of COVID-19 found in B.C., no new deaths
- No singing or dancing allowed as Ontario reopens restaurant patios
- Loneliness can directly impair immune system, increase risk of death: study
- Study reveals Canada's most trusted brands during pandemic

Related Stories

- 'We've been so blessed': In-person long-term care visits resume in some provinces
- Troops could be called to testify in lawsuits against long-term care homes

"We don't want these petty outdoor visits which do nothing to work against the very dangerous harms of isolation among the elderly," said Stamatopoulos, who noted family caregivers often feed, wash or bathe residents.

"Any myth that families ship off their loved ones to these homes to die in isolation is incorrect. Their continued involvement in long-term care will help keep residents alive. There is no question about that."

FAMILY CAREGIVERS SHOULD BE ON FRONTLINES IF 'WILLING AND ABLE'

Nathan Stall, geriatric physician at Mount Sinai Hospital, says family caregivers not only play an essential role in the health system, their direct involvement in care reduces mortality.

"[Long-term care homes] treat visitors as this luxury – a nice thing to have rather than a necessity," Stall told CTVNews.ca by phone Monday.

"Family caregivers are essential care partners. Many of them provide direct care to their loved ones who are in a retirement or nursing home, and would be just as capable learning infection prevention and control measures or learning how to properly don and doff PPE."

Stall, whose own grandmother is a retirement home resident, says these essential caregivers should be given the ability to provide hands-on care if they are willing and able to, pandemic or not, noting that in Quebec and Ontario the military were brought in to assist with tasks normally provided by family caregivers.

"The metrics that we're using to guide the decisions about letting visitors in are guided only by the COVID-19 caseloads and deaths. But we are not capturing the collateral damage that is occurring as a result of lockdown," he said, noting there is no data on deaths unrelated to COVID-19.

"People are dying of other conditions that are related to the lockdown but not to COVID-19 itself. We need to be capturing those metrics as well when we are thinking about that risk balance of is it worth keeping people in lockdown."

Each province has handled the crisis differently. Quebec, for example, said caregivers would be able to visit long-term care facilities during active COVID-19 outbreaks, but on a case-by-case basis and depending on region.

How do Canada's provinces rank against American states?

Public Health Agency of Canada releases guidance on what fully vaccinated can do

What you need to know about the federal government's ArriveCAN app

CORONAVIRUS TOP STORIES

At least 1.3 million Canadians opted to mix COVID-19 vaccines by the end of June

Alberta and British Columbia have made similar declarations. However, many caregivers still reported being banned from entering the homes.

More provinces are now allowing visitors at long-term care homes, but those visits are largely restricted to outdoor, physically distanced interactions that experts say are highly restrictive.

CanAge, Canada's national seniors' advocacy organization, is now lobbying the federal and provincial governments to develop an essential caregivers program that would deem family caregivers essential.

"We didn't have a good strategy for how to have a maintained lockdown situation and we should have. And we're going to need one, because COVID-19 is going to be with us for 18 to 24 months and maybe on an ongoing basis," CanAge CEO Laura Tamblyn Watts told CTVNews.ca by phone Tuesday.

"We have been talking to governments across the country advocating for this and helping to develop this type of programming."

That framework may include granting essential family caregivers with the credentials and training they need to provide care safely on the frontlines and outlining different requirements for testing and vaccination protocols.

The organization is set to release a national seniors' platform at the end of the month that will include suggestions about how that framework might be implemented.

"This is differentiating between the nice visit from your niece for a cup of tea and a quick catch-up and instead acknowledging that the daughter that comes in twice a day is really providing hands on home care, bathing, feeding, et cetera," Tamblyn Watts said.

"They're not just a visitor. They're an essential part of the care team and that is something we need to develop quickly and institute on an ongoing basis so this doesn't happen again."

RELATED IMAGES

When will children under 12 be vaccinated against COVID-19?

WHO recommends Roche, Sanofi drugs for COVID-19 to cut death risk

Six people injected with saline instead of COVID-19 vaccine at Ontario clinic in June

With 46 more COVID-19 infections confirmed in 24 hours, B.C. now has 602 active cases

VIDEO EXPLAINERS

What is known about the new Lambda COVID-19 variant?

